Recovery Act Feature

Work continues on Feynman Computing Center upgrades

Construction crews pour concrete Nov. 12 at an electrical feeder station.

Construction crews continue to make progress on upgrades to the electrical and cooling systems for Feynman Computing Center, which is funded by the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act.

FESS engineer Tim Trout, who is supervising construction, said crews are scheduled to complete the electrical feeder upgrades by Jan. 31. Construction crews have partially completed preparation work on a rooftop cooling system at Feynman Computing Center, Trout said.

The following photos show recent progress on the construction project.

LHC to be started up after fault forced year-long closure

From Times Online, Nov. 19, 2009

The Large Hadron Collider (LHC) will be started up tomorrow for the first time since a catastrophic fault forced it to be shut down for more than a year.

Engineers at the Cern particle physics laboratory plan to begin injecting protons into the world's most powerful atom-smasher at around 4pm GMT tomorrow afternoon, after the "big bang machine" was formally handed over to its operations team.

A first beam of particles should be circulating one way around the LHC's 27km (17-mile) ring by Saturday, and the second beam traveling in the opposite direction should be captured soon afterwards.

General contractor Larry Bohr, a co-owner of Don Bohr & Sons, on left, and his son, Andy Bohr, on the right, on Nov. 12 as they pour concrete that will support electrical equipment at Feynman Computing Center. The higher electrical capacity from the upgrades will power a new computing center at the FCC.

FESS engineer Timothy Trout talks with contractor Larry Bohr during a walk through of the electrical system construction site.

UC appoints Paul Alivisatos director of Berkeley Lab

From Lawrence Berkeley National Lab,
Nov. 19, 2009

The University of California Board of Regents on Nov. 19 named Paul Alivisatos director of the Department of Energy's Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory, which is managed by the university.

"Paul Alivisatos' scientific expertise and management experience have earned the respect and confidence of the lab staff, the academic community, the DOE, and other federal and industrial sponsors," said UC President Mark Yudof. "I am confident that Paul is the right leader for the Berkeley Lab at this pivotal point in its history. Under his leadership, Berkeley Lab will continue to make great contributions in science and to the world around us."
